We shall argue that Maimonides's theory of providence as consequent upon the intellect and evil as consequent upon the absence of intellectual perfection are based on the concept of God as existence. It is the absence of intellectual perfection that marks man qua animal and leaves him open to chance occurrences and evil.

One without intellect who does not overcome his base matter follows the evil inclination, i.e. the imagination, and, as Maimonides already explained, does not receive divine providence. He is left to suffer the chance circumstances of the material world. The discussion of evil also confirms this interpretation. Maimonides writes that 1

Divine Providence in Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed ...

Divine Providence watches over people belonging to the human species and based upon their circumstances and behavior, which can be either good, or evil, they will receive what they have been ordained to receive. This Maimonides calls this their deserts.

Moses Maimonides, the foremost Jewish philosopher of the Middle Ages offers a solution to this problem through his theory of providence. In this thesis, I argue that for Maimonides providence comes in stages and his theodicy is formed by the first two stages of his theory of providence that I take to be comprising of essentially three stages.

Maimonides on Evil and Providence Rambam is famous for incorporating Aristotelian thought into his philosophy, but he is not usually associated with Stoic philosophy. However, there are numerous points of contact between Stoic philosophy and Rambam's analysis of theodicy and divine providence in his Guide for the Perplexed .
